

WAGOLL: Is going to school in France a better option?

This argument is to discuss whether it is a good idea to be educated in France. Is it possible that their schools are better than our English ones?

The first point in favour of this argument that I would like to make is they have a ten week break in summer. This would be a good idea because it allows you to totally relax with your family and do lots of different things.

Secondly, I am in favour of going to school in France as they do not have to wear school uniform. Wearing your own clothes makes you different and I am more comfortable wearing non-uniform.

Thirdly, I would love to be educated in France because I believe that having to repeat the year would make me work very hard.

However, against this argument, I would not like to go to school in France because I would not enjoy the long days. Getting to school for eight o'clock would be hard for me and I believe that finishing at five o'clock is far too late, making me extremely tired.

Secondly, I would not be in favour of getting my own school equipment because this would be very expensive for my family and carrying the equipment around every day would be very heavy.

Thirdly, I am against the idea because I enjoy having RE lessons and learning about different faiths and I know they do not have these lessons in France.

To conclude, in my own personal opinion, I feel that given the choice I do prefer English schools.
